In the amazing world of American politics, it often seems like the two major parties don't just communicate, separated by the very words they use, but actually live in entirely different universes. Democrats and Republicans don't merely disagree on the issues, they don't even agree on the meanings of the words they use to discuss the issues. Democrats and Republicans don't merely have different opinions, they have different dictionaries. Democrats and Republicans don't merely have different dictionaries, they have different grammars. Democrats and Republicans don't merely have different grammars, they have different languages. Democrats and Republicans don't merely speak different languages, they have different cultures. Democrats and Republicans don't merely have different cultures, they have different civilizations. Democrats and Republicans don't merely have different civilizations, they have different species. Democrats and Republicans don't merely belong to different species, they belong to different genuses. Democrats and Republicans don't merely belong to different genuses, they belong to different phyla. Democrats and Republicans don't merely belong to different phyla, they belong to different kingdoms. Democrats and Republicans don't merely belong to different kingdoms, they belong to different domains. Democrats and Republicans don't merely belong to different domains, they belong to different universes. Democrats and Republicans don't merely live in different universes, they live in different multiverses.

Below, you will find a list of many (but certainly not all) of the words that Democrats and Republicans use differently. Democrats use the words in the left column, Republicans use the words in the right column.
